Three of four childhood vaccinations help protect against the sexually transmitted disease chlamydia. But one of the primary vaccines for preventing the infection, the vaccine against human papillomavirus (HPV), may need a booster shot. A flu vaccine can also help protect against the disease. One major difference between chlamydia and HPV is that both diseases can be easily and easily treated and cured. Although HPV may not be curable with antibiotics like Chlamydia, it's easier to treat and cure than Chlamydia. For both Chlamydia and HPV, the best defense is a vaccine. Concussions are a leading cause of death and disability in children and adolescents. High school students, athletes and others who play contact sports or participate in activities that include head blows risk injuries. Here's some advice from a sports medicine doctor on how to treat a concussion. Our daughter, a second grader, was in dance camp and decided to go into a fast-paced dance competition a week earlier than her teacher would have recommended. The result was a concussion. The headaches started almost immediately after the dance and didn't go away in a week. She had difficulty sleeping and didn't seem to have a life outside of school. She was dizzy most of the time, had to sleep on her side to get comfortable and tended to avoid bright lights. She missed 10 days of school (including three days of dance camp) and that's part of why I think she was affected so much by the concussion. My daughter is a very spirited, energetic, and sometimes headstrong child. She didn't complain about the concussion or her symptoms. She simply sat down, rested, and after a few days she was back to her normal self. Here's my advice on how to treat a concussion: 1. Seek medical attention immediately. The first step is to take your child to the pediatrician or child-welfare services, who will try to figure out what is going on. The second step is to get evaluated by a sports medicine doctor. 2. Have the child head-to-toe examined by a sports medicine doctor. 3. You, your child and the doctor will do the following: a. Determine if the concussion is related to an activity the child participated in. It is important to note that even mild head traumas can be associated

When Republicans picked up a Senate seat in Massachusetts and the House of Representatives flipped from blue to red in Georgia, as polls close tonight, the GOP picked up at least one seat it won't have to defend in 2018, at least according to exit polls conducted by Edison Research for Axios. What those polls aren't telling us is whether there will be shifts in the final results in either of these states. Exit polling data could easily swing the other way and it's also possible that something unexpected and politically consequential happens between now and Election Day. So, we checked with a vote expert to help us get a better picture of how these races have played out as voters leave their polling stations. Here's what he told us. The polls, and spin In Massachusetts, Democrat Sen. Elizabeth Warren appears to have crushed incumbent Republican Sen. Scott Brown by three points, with Brown at 38 percent to Warren's 41 percent, according to a Suffolk University/7 News poll. Those numbers are virtually identical to the New York Times Upshot/Siena College poll published on Tuesday, which gave Warren a two-point lead over Brown. A Quinnipiac University poll released Friday also gives Warren a one-point lead. As Scott Clement of CBS News noted, the difference between them is in the last question, where Quinnipiac asks whether respondents would vote for either a Democrat or a Republican even if their preferred candidate were not on the ballot. But in that question, 12 percent of voters in Massachusetts say they would consider voting for a Republican, including 7 percent who say they would be willing to back a Republican over Brown. So, is Warren a clear favorite to win? No. Is Brown a heavy underdog? Not at all. In Georgia, Democrats are in the clear in their bid for two statewide seats: gubernatorial candidate Stacey Abrams and former state House Minority Leader Stacey Evans, who is running for the U.S. House. According to the exit poll from Edison/Axios, Abrams leads Republican Brian Kemp by six points in the gubernatorial race, with 50 percent to his 44 percent. That's much different than a recent Siena College poll that gave Kemp a more than 10-point lead in the governor's race. The polls themselves aren't that far apart. And the exit poll numbers are very similar to other recent exit polls, like ABC/
