some critics may believe that it is appropriate for the government to play a role in creating a societal consensus in a free society. this objection may be rooted in a concern that the government should not be regarded as a threat to individual liberty, particularly in the context of a public health emergency. therefore, government should not be permitted to restrict individual rights for the common good. for example, the government should not be permitted to restrict a person's freedom of movement or freedom to choose a particular lifestyle in a pandemic. a further objection is that a state of emergency may be created to serve the interests of political parties and not the interests of society as a whole. this objection may be rooted in the belief that government should not take actions that are in the self-interest of those in power but in the interest of the public. critics may believe that the government should not be permitted to divert money from a national health budget for things that are in the self-interest of particular parties or groups. critics may believe that the government should not be permitted to spend resources on projects that are in the self-interest of particular parties or groups or that are not directly in the public interest. although this objection may be rooted in the belief that government should not control the economy, it is not that simple. the government must set priorities and allocate limited resources in times of crisis, and the government should be able to take action that benefits society as a whole. regardless of whether the government controls the economy or not, it is in the self-interest of the government to protect the lives of its citizens, and the government must be able to take steps to protect its citizens from infectious diseases. finally, some critics may believe that the government should not be permitted to increase its power and budget to the detriment of other societal needs.

this is the real root of the problem when it comes to green energy: storing it. see, there's a reason we don't just frankenstein the hell out of the electrical grid and collect infinite amounts of energy from lightning strikes. batteries that can store enough electrical energy to power a town are both insanely expensive and complete garbage, which as you may have noticed are not two superlatives that go well together. storing five kilowatts of energy in lithium-ion batteries (roughly the average monthly amount it takes to power a hair dryer) literally costs thousands of dollars. together, the economic and social costs of flu-induced complications that are compounded when large numbers of children are hospitalized were largely borne by the state and locally in the united states. data from the 2010-11 influenza season in the united states indicate an influenza-associated excess hospitalization rate per 1,000 of 1.96 (a rate 3.6 times higher than the overall adult inpatient rate during the same period). excess mortality rates exceeded hospitalization rates for all ages; however, they were greatest among adults ages 65 years and older, with a rate of excess mortality per 1,000 of 8.37. in addition, self-reported absenteeism due to influenza averaged 18.7 days among u.s. workers in the 2010-11 influenza season (baker et al., 2012). the rapid increase in the number of cases of influenza a h1n1 virus infection in ontario and elsewhere in canada and internationally was a relatively small percentage of the total number of person-years of influenza virus circulation. moreover, the relatively large number of deaths that occurred in canada in the spring of 2009 was much smaller than that expected for a typical influenza season; an average of 9,821 influenza-related deaths had been recorded annually during the five years from 1998 to 2002 (canadian centre for vaccinology, 2009b). 5ec8ef588b
