Why have so few doctors become entrepreneurs? Why have so few doctors become entrepreneurs? Common Knowledge Why have so few doctors become entrepreneurs? Benedict Kofsky, MD, has a great success story on Entrepreneur.com. An Ophthalmologist by training, he's also a podcaster and the author of the book "How to Run a Successful Vision Clinic." A number of years ago, Dr. Kofsky founded a vision care clinic that ran at a loss for nearly a decade, and while it's no longer in business, the business principles he used have clearly worked well for him. Unfortunately, I know too many doctors whose entrepreneurial dreams were quenched after their training. Most doctors lack at least the two key skills needed to succeed as entrepreneurs. The first skill, says Dr. Kofsky, is "knowing who you are." Most aspiring physicians are too busy learning their subjects (such as anatomy, pharmacology, pathology, microbiology, physics, etc.) to actually "know themselves" or to figure out who they are and what they're good at. Also, most medical students don't start out with the idea of being entrepreneurial. While they are doing their clinical work and medical education, they are not thinking about how they can have other lines of work. The second skill is "knowing how to market yourself," says Dr. Kofsky. Most doctors really don't get good at selling their
